every town of importance in the three kingdoms during the next ten years. In 1864, the Doctor in the service of a metropolitan firm, at the East-end of London. Here he was in the centre of the London Irish, among whom, for certain reasons, he held a commanding position: By this time Fenianism was in full swing every-where, and in fuller swing in London than anywhere else. All good Fenians might have been very frank in their estimation. It was in fact extremely difficult to describe—intensely patriotic and intensely vindictive; intensely vain, insolent, and overbearing; and intensely blackguardly, too. Concomitantly the Fenians were just a mighty naturalist: It was drinking-deep from morning till night; and drinking still deeper from night till morning. The Doctor was a Fenian of the Fenians. Initiated in boyhood into the association and frequent meetings, he was enabled him to do what the superbores considered excellent just among them, and became very popular. He was keen as well as during—cautious as well as dashing. Above all, he, a gentleman in all respects, was so exceedingly. Then he could make himself so agreeable in all companies that it was impossible for any company with a grain of patriotism in its composition to discern a fault in the Doctor therefrom. He was free to indulge to the utmost at the cost of the brotherhood, which is saying a great deal—for no body of men ever contributed more liberally to a cause; and the Doctor was entrusted with a number of offices which gave him the command of unlimited funds. Among other offices, he held that of superintendent of the agents—employed about seduce the solitary laborer, and prosper in his hands. Every week saw batches of deserters transmitted from various quarters to one or other of the Penian hiding-places for such people in the East. Here they changed their clothing, and hence, after some days of comparative indulgence, they were sent to the United States, where they were exhibited to the American branch of the brotherhood as the best possible evidence of the work being done at home; and some for various parts of Ireland, where they were to be employed as drill-masters, &c., until the day of action should arrive.

It was known as the Doctor could not not escape the notice of the Government, which ever since the Chicago Congress of 1863 had been fully alive to the conspiracy and the continued to keep a vigilance of the conspirators—

continued to keep a vigilant eye on the doings of the conspirators—an eye so vigilant indeed, that none of the conspirators was able to keep his back to the wall, as the saying is noted down and which, as one or other of these chiefs, or of such of them as were within reach, became too dangerous to be left long at large, caused him to be seized and secured. This last was always done by the arrest of the conspirators, and the arrest of the result of long-continued supervision, but in every case looked upon it—up to the seizure of the offices of the Irish People—as accidental. One after another, such men as "Pagan" O'Leary were captured, and the following fashion:—The Government officials were sent out against them by chance, and one after another they were tried under false names, as if the Government were totally ignorant of their identity and antecedents. The Doctor was placed under Government supervision early in 1904, and soon afterwards with the Government agents which left him at liberty to carry on as precisely as before. Thereafter the English, and especially importance; but as these arrests were made in the bungling fashion to which we have just alluded, they excited no suspicion in the minds of the brethren. Consequently, the year now drew to a close, and the conspiracy grew more and more active. The conspiracy grew, and had which portended conflagration, the Government threw of the mask and showed watchful—especially towards the seducers of his soldiers. (The latter were especially in consequence he thought it right to quit London—a step that had the full approval of the brotherhood. On reaching Dublin he thought necessary that he should quit the country for a time, and he was despatched to New York on a confidential mission. In America he was allowed to see everything, and a full report of all he saw was sent to the brethren. He returned to Dublin in 1865, and was immediately posted to the "Scientific Department" of the conspiracy. Here he had much to do with the manufacturers of arms and ammunition recently established by the Irish-American chiefs who took the lead in the brotherhood after the arrest of Stephens. Siding with these people against his ancient enemy, the Doctor did much towards driving Stephens from the country, after his escape from Richmond bridewell.

While thus ingratiating himself with Messrs. Kelly, McCafferty, and Company, the Doctor contrived to betray the principal factories one after another to the gentlemen at the Castle. This he did so cleverly that at the time no suspicion attached to him. On one occasion this cleverness in his betrayal of the principal works of the security of the large Curran & Fenian arm factory in Dublin, which took place in February, 1866, inflicted a blow on the association that was widely and deeply felt. A cry of treachery, accompanied by a demand for the immediate detection and punishment of the traitor, was raised by the brotherhood. The leaders with a schism would ensue. Somehow suspicion was made to fall on a bricklayer who had been employed in the building. This man was afterwards, on the 17th inst., taken to the gallows, and his name was decreed to a secluded spot on the outer skirts of Dublin, where a band of assassins had been placed in ambush. Here the bricklayer was first stunned "with the stroke of a bludgeon, and then received a shot through the body which proved mortal three days afterwards. It was well known that the poor fellow, a Fenian himself, was the victim of a conspiracy, and that the death of the man was a consequence could be drawn from him. He said enough, however, to designate the principal agents with tolerable distinctness. Half a dozen of the numerous loose fishes calling themselves "doctors" who infest Dublin, and all other large towns; were arrested; but no evidence could be found against any of the prisoners, and all were set at liberty in a few days. Moreover, the first and only confession was made by the man who had been shot, and who lay in the house of one of their number. There was not a man of them who had not been servicer to the Doctor at one time or another. In this house the whole band was captured, at a single cast of the police-net, by the contrivance of the Doctor, who being himself in the heat, remained unobserved. The prisoners were taken to the police-station, and charged with guilt; and thus, allowing evidence to be adduced against them, they must inevitably be convicted and receive the heaviest sentences awarded at that time to treason-felony. Accordingly, it was proposed that they should all plead guilty, and thus, shutting out the terrible evidence which, as they well knew, the prosecution was prepared to bring forward, escape with
